

GO ASK ALEX P.N.P.

Your personable-non-professional

By: Alexandra Gordon

Dear Alex,

I have tried for years to find that special someone, and I'm getting to that point where I have had enough of doing the searching, the calling, the writing to that someone, when I get nothing in return. Should I keep on trying or wait for that special someone to come to me?

-Exhausted

Exhausted,

I am a firm believer that special someones tend to present themselves when you least expect it, when you're not looking. If you spend your time looking, you spend less time on your own development. Then, when you do find that someone, you're not prepared. Let yourself be attracted to someone naturally and coincidentally. Work on you for the time being. Work on being the best you can be and I promise someone will find his/her way into your life. Stop working so hard and have a little faith.

Dear Alex,

A couple of weeks ago, I just stopped giving a crap about people who have no effect in my life, I mean to that extent where you are just straight forward with people and tell them to their face what you think about them. And its happening especially because I'm a senior, and with these few days left of school I just want to let my emotions out. In this society, I live with a bunch of fake people. I feel like if I let my feelings out it will put some sense into them. Is this right or putting myself in a corner?

-Fed up

Fed up,

I condone telling people exactly what you think of them. Now that doesn't mean reaming someone out in front of a large crowd is okay, but I agree with you that this society is fake. Everyone talks sh about everyone, everywhere; and high school is the worst. Don't go on some immature rampage, be creative. If you're talking to someone who says something really condescending or obnoxious alert them to what they did and the fact that you don't like it, in an intelligent way. This is done without four letter words and attitude, but with carriage and style. Don't be on their level, rise above.

NEED ADVICE?

E-mail your questions to Alex at TalkTeens.com